Comprehension

Read the passage and answer the questions below:

We can break mountains apart; we can drain the rivers and flood the valleys. We can turn the most luxurious forests into throwaway paper products. We can tear apart the great grass cover of the western plains and pour toxic chemicals into the soil and pesticides onto the fields until the soil is dead and blown away in the wind. We can pollute air with acids, rivers with sewage, the sea with oil—all this with an intoxication with our power for devastation at an order of magnitude beyond all reckoning. We can invent computers capable of processing ten million calculations per second. And why? To increase the volume and speed with which we move natural resources through the consumer economy to the junk pile or waste heap.

Read the passage and answer the questions below:

I remember the first time when I went to a swimming pool here in the United States. I grew up a great lover of swimming. The river that separated our village from the next served as our swimming pool, and my friends and I would eagerly await the monsoon season—it was great sport for us to swim all the way to the other bank, trying not to be pushed off course by the powerful flood current. You can understand my surprise, then, when I came to the pool and saw a young man floating in an inner tube, sipping a soft drink. I had expected rows of energetic Americans swimming lap after lap, but all I found was this chap drifting in the sun. As I spoke with him, it became clear that, this was his idea of putting a swimming pool to its best use. He was really under the impression that he was having a grand time.

Question Description
